

From the Editor

I'm writing this in the week between Christmas and New Year's Day and my thoughts are in that reflective, but planning ahead mode that seems to hit about this time. In wrapping up this edition, I could not help but think about all the other wrapping up that's happened lately – the Christmas presents, the end of the semester, the clean-up from Hurricane Matthew (well, partially), and a number of personal projects. We wrapped up a crazy election season; regardless of whether or not your candidate won, it's over. This fall my financial advisor was getting serious about my retirement options and wrapping up my career. Yikes! How did that happen? (And, for the record, we're talking years, not months!) It's been interesting, but, then most years are.

On the other hand, there are some new starts ahead. My granddaughter is in the midst of interviewing for graduate school. My husband's brewery is moving to a much larger building in February. I have a brand new class this spring and am considering a career move. I have a whole new list of projects for 2017. And, of course, tomorrow I start work on the next issue of the Southeast Case Research Journal. I get excited about the New Year and all its promises. While I'll not keep most of my resolutions much past mid-January, there's always the possibility that this year I may!

And speaking of resolutions

1. If you have a case in progress WRAP it UP and send it in.
2. If you don't, START one (and send it in, too).

Looking forward to another wonderful, crazy year!
